To understand the problems inherent in a term like third world, it is essential to consider the global geopolitics that have driven our conceptual frame works for dividing the world.

(A) This simplistic framework was far from problem-free. Russia and much of Latin America fit poorly in this system. For example, Russia represented the core of a geopolitical East while still being part of an industrialized, historically Christian West. Yet determined scholars labored to smooth out the contradiction, effectively globalizing concepts by linking each to environmental conditions.

(B) The division of labor in the American academy reflected this worldview, effectively allocating different pieces of the earth's terrain to different scholarly fields. Social scientists and those in the mainstream humanities generally concentrated on the West. Orientalists, trained in the arts and literatures of civilized Asia, took on the East. And anthropologists held a near monopoly over the people without history, resident of the so-called primitive world.

(C) In the first half of the twentieth century, a very different scheme of division prevailed in the United States. At the time, two major civilizations, an advanced and enlightened West and an idle Orient were seen as sharing the globe with a third realm of primitive societies, found in such isolated areas as Central Africa and New Guinea.
