It is well recognized that the study of a language can reveal much about how its speakers think, both as individuals and as members of the culture. While the majority of contemporary linguists have rejected the strongest versions of the hypothesis that one's language constrains the ways in which one habitually thinks, there is no doubt that _____. As linguists argue, this relationship between language and thought is dynamic. They say that the experience of spoken language is actively constructed by the hearer's mental grammar. Given that this mental grammar is a product of the hearer's cultural experience, an examination of language in the context of cultural contact can provide insights about the relative attitudes of the two communities involved.
