

Truth has ever to be sought and renewed, reshaped and developed, so that, as understood by man, it may keep in line with the growth of his thought and the development of human life. Only then does it become a living truth for humanity, supplying the essential need for which it craves. But if some one aspect of truth has been petrified by dogma in a past age, it ceases to adapt itself to the changing need of humanity. Indeed, it is probably not even understood to the extent it was understood in that past age when it grew up and was clothed in the language and symbols of that age. For its context is different in a later age, the mental climate has changed. Moreover, as a philosopher has pointed out, every truth, however true in itself, yet, standing alone from others which at once limit and complete it, becomes a snare to bind the intellect and a misleading dogma; for in reality _____ . [3점]

* petrify: 굳히다

- ① the inflexible truth must be like a frozen heart
- ② a fish must sometimes jump out and see the world
- ③ an arrow never turns back to the bow
- ④ the truth should exist for its own sake
- ⑤ no thread must be taken apart from the fabric